The Environmental Movement: A new religion for our time?

The environmental crisis is one of the greatest social problems of our age, and for activists the environmental movement has become a belief-system in its own right, almost a secular religion. Yet it has also been embraced by all the Christian Churches.

This illustrated talk, given by Peter Whitfield, looks at the emergence of environmentalism over the past fifty years, and goes on to pose some pointed questions about the Churches' position. It asks whether the environmental issue may not be subtly altering the very nature of Christian belief.
