Aubade for the Shortest Day

(After the painting Cimitiere en Provence by Frederic Montenard)

As the year turns the days lessening is done
And the shortest day draws slowly toward its end
Now the year grows steadily and we begin to taste
Spring even though the winter snows have not yet
Thawed but the signs of new life begin to emerge

These same signs in the lives of humankind the tell-Tale signs of age, the greying, the slowing, without
The renewing of life, for people as winter follows
Autumn there is no spring ahead just the steady
Decay as life begins its final descent to earth

Some approach this time with settled optimism
Some with fear and anxious dreams of darkness
For others there is a raging against the dying
Of the light accompanied by the loss of senses
Reason that had served so well the dis-embodied
Voice of one who has become a stranger to himself

I take my chance with the darkness, launching
Myself into the coming night as though unafraid
Cursing the darkness, raising a glass in defiance
Toasting the gods who claim their victories

Before lying down to sleep through the years
That lie ahead, the rhythm of this eternal sleep
Will last for far more lifetimes than have been lived

And there will be no spring to warm the earth
No re-current pulse of life awakening the sleeper
Of the age, no return of summer, no warmth
To make the grave a less solemn cold bed
Only memories, only the name by which I
Was known, sieved through the memories
Of those who knew me until finally lost

And in a graveyard some future traveller
Might pause by the dried flowers on the dust
Covered stone and read my name and ask
Who was this man and what became of his Hopes and dreams, his words and songs
Now all lost, all gone and pause to reflect
That his own final chapter has just begun

82 of the military dead from the torpedoed 'Transylvania' are buried in the Commonwealth plot and the names of a further 274 are inscribed on a screen wall there.

The Translyvania

taken from an article by Cassandra Tanti and Kate Williams, The Riviera Times

On that fateful day on 4th May 1917, 2,860 British soldiers, 200 officers and 60 Red Cross nurses were travelling on board the Transylvania, heading towards Alexandria in Egypt from Marseille.

The Cunard ship made its maiden voyage from Liverpool to New York in November 1914, but just one year later it was taken over by the British government for war purposes. The luxury steamboat - 167 metres long and weighing around 15,000 tons - was equipped with all the latest technology, including the telegraph. But it failed to help the SS Transylvania.

Little did the crew, or their Japanese escorts - the Matsu and Sakaki - know, that on this sunny, blustery May day, the Commander of the German 64 metre submarine U-63 was executing a carefully planned war strategy - to sink all of the ships at sea.

At 10am, near the Island of Bergeggi in front of Savona, a torpedo struck the engine room of the Transylvania. The Matsu came alongside and began to take troops on board, while the Sakaki circled to force the submarine to remain submerged.

Twenty minutes later, a second torpedo was seen heading straight for the Matsu, but it managed to manoeuvre out of harms way. Instead, the torpedo struck the Transylvania, a second blow that sank the ship immediately. Ten crew members, 29 army officers, and 373 soldiers perished.

Among those who lost their lives was the ship's Captain, Brennell. North of the shipwreck, in Savona, 89 bodies were retrieved and buried in a small cemetery called Zinola. Further victims were discovered in France, Monaco and Spain. Out of the 85 Commonwealth WWI graves at the cemetery in Savona, 83 of them are victims of the Translyvania tragedy.

Amazingly enough however, 2,708 passengers did survive, the majority saved by Japanese lifeboats. Ligurian fisherman, who had seen the attack from the shore, also immediately jumped into their boats and braved strong winds to save as many lives as possible. With injured, bloody hands, they headed towards the harbours of Noli and Finale Ligure.

An enormous wave of solidarity swept over the nation on 4th May 1917. In the overcrowded hospitals in the area, those who had been injured were housed; the Ligurian habitants opened their doors and welcomed in the English despite their poor financial conditions. The local monasteries also warmly welcomed victims. Language difficulties didn't prevent close friendships developing - at the time a number of Ligurian inhabitants had never come face to face with a foreigner.

In October 2011, the remains of the sunken ship were discovered near the Ligurian coast. For years, the Carabinieri had been examining eye witness reports, trying to determine the location of the disaster. Diver units within the Carabinieri of Genoa finally discovered the shipwreck 630 metres deep with the help of a special robot; it was not far from the Island of Bergeggi.

On April 28th 2012 in the ancient abbey of Santa Caterina in Finalborgo, Italian, English, Japanese and German representatives commemorated the 1917 sinking of the SS Transylvania.
